milk matters: infant feeding and immune disorder

a book that will change how you think about infant feeding

These three books, under one cover, are truly shocking.

- Book 1 argues that immune damage has been acquired vertically, compounding intergenerationally, through early infant nutrition;
- Book 2 documents the ongoing ad hoc experiment of infant formulas, and their negative consequences;
- Book 3 links science and history to everyday infant problems, giving clear practical advice about current debates, and preventing or resolving dietary distress in young children.

It's a work of huge vision, based in extensive knowledge and understanding, yet it is easy to read and understand without specialist technical knowledge... A book to change the world, and people's understanding of it.

Professor Mary Renfrew FRSE, Director, Mother and Infant Research Unit; Deputy Dean: Research, University of Dundee

I have read this book from cover to cover. It is truly amazing. I learned something on virtually every page! In a sentence, I think this book will ultimately bring about the demise of the infant formula industry.

Professor Roger V. Short AM ScD FAA FRS

Maureen Minchin's Breastfeeding Matters (1985) was a milestone in the history of breastfeeding. Milk Matters: infant feeding and immune disorder, has much to teach parents, professors and paediatricians.

Professor Marilyn B. Renfree AO DSc FAA FAIBiol

Milk Matters is an important book, as relevant to unhappy parents of distressed babies as it is to genomic researchers, gastroenterologists and allergists. We were all babies once, and how we were fed has much to do with who we now are, and will influence our children and grandchildren.

James Akre, WHO Nutrition (1980–2004)

THE AUTHOR

Maureen Minchin has been pivotal in global efforts to protect, promote and support better infant feeding practices since the 1970s. She helped create the lactation consultant profession, was consultant to international bodies such as WHO and UNICEF, and worked to educate health professionals both directly and by being involved in creating university-based courses in the UK and Australia; she was involved in the creation of the global who/UNICEF Baby Friendly Initiative. Her ground-breaking book, Food for Thought, a parent's guide to food intolerance, was published in Australia, the UK and Japan. Her work with families over decades has been pro bono; she is on the Editorial Board of the open access International Breastfeeding Journal. Contact her via the website for media enquiries and speaking engagements.
